

Supreme Court Clarifies Award of Attorney's Fees in Copyright Cases

JUNE 2016

The Copyright Act provides that a district court, in its discretion, “may award a reasonable attorney’s fee to the prevailing party.” On June 16, in Kirtsaeng v. John Wiley & Sons, the Supreme Court of the United States clarified that courts “should give substantial weight to the objective reasonableness of the losing party’s position” but also take into account all other relevant factors.
