

Trademarks

Overview

At Tucker Ellis, we counsel our clients to help them make informed business decisions in the adoption, protection, and enforcement of their brands. We develop well-formulated trademark strategies that further enhance our clients' intellectual property portfolios and bring added value to their companies.

Trademarks can be words, names, scents, sounds, symbols, or even devices as long as they identify and distinguish a company's goods and services by indicating the source. Because consumers readily identify a certain level of quality with purchased goods and services, trademarks are vital to a company's brand and business to distinguish its product offerings from those of its competitors. While our clients often seek trademark protection for their brand names and logos, our trademark team also assists them with nontraditional marks such as trade dress, including product packaging, product configuration, and color marks – providing protection for a potentially infinite amount of time.

We listen closely to our clients to glean information about their marks and use so that we can develop a trademark protection strategy tailored for a specific geographic region and facilitate filings and protection. Before adopting a new brand or pursuing protection on a mark, our experienced team performs trademark screening and clearance to determine whether a mark or brand can be used as desired or if a new direction should be pursued to avoid other established trademarks. We have extensive experience with filing and prosecuting federal trademark applications with the U.S. Trademark Office, securing trademark rights at the state level, and evaluating common law trademark rights in geographic areas where unregistered marks are used.

The Tucker Ellis team is experienced in all of the various stages of enforcement – from sending cease and desist letters, to opposition filings with the U.S. Trademark Office, to preparing and filing complaints with state or federal courts. Our trademark enforcement strategies have successfully precluded third parties from using, infringing, and misappropriating trademarks. Our clients can choose from a variety of avenues of enforcement so that our legal strategy aligns with their business goals and cost concerns. Our team also has pioneered successful techniques to enforce trademark rights in third-party marketplaces – including Amazon® and eBay® – where stopping illegal activity is often daunting. In addition to our proprietary techniques used to stop illegal trademark activity, our team can thwart trademark infringers through requests made to web hosts or website platforms of third-party marketplaces.

The depth of experience brought by our experienced team of IP attorneys helps clients understand the complexities of the trademark process and provides peace of mind in protecting their valuable brands.
